

STREET CAR GLIMPSES.

Fifty Miles of Travel for a Quarter of a Dollar.

OVER THE VARIOUS CAR LINES.

Cheap and Convenient Way of Seeing the Sights of a Great City.

There are a little over forty-four miles of street railway in this city, and the six tickets which one can purchase for a quarter will cover them all, including about five miles of Herdline lines. In this ride one can see more magnificent residences, more elegant drives and lawns, more parks, fountains and statues, more points of interest, connected with the history of our country's growth and prosperity, more massive public buildings and evidences of public wealth than in any city in the Union. One will not see as much poverty and misery and squalor as he will find in other large cities, but he will have an opportunity to study human nature in a field of varied subjects presented by the cosmopolitan gathering of people of all lands at our Capital.

Take an F street car going west, at Seventh street, early in the afternoon when the sun seems to be about three feet above the top of the Treasury building. These open cars on the F street line are pleasant to ride in, for only two people sit in one seat. One rattles along down F street past the massive front and steps of the Patent Office, although he may not notice this building because he sees it every day, but this southern entrance is a magnificent piece of architecture. Westward on F street you go at a rapid rate, and just as the car turns around Fourteenth street with a jerk it is almost as if it were in a glimpse of a group of gentlemen sitting on the western side of the Ebbitt House on the pavement. This is a great looking place, and late in the day, when the sun has set, it is a pleasant place to sit and eat dinner and the bottle of summer claret you can see a round dozen of jolly well-dressed gentlemen sitting on the sidewalk smoking and relating yarns, and the portly form of Major Ben Perley is frequently the centre of the yarn-telling groups.

On historic ground. On up the slight hill on Fourteenth street you go and around the corner of H street. This is historic ground. All these stately looking houses have histories. As you cross Vermont avenue at Arlington, look to the left down the street. Here is a row of old houses, once occupied by Federal statesmen, and the house where an attempt was made to assassinate Secretary Seward and nearly in front of which General Sikes shot Barton Key. As you pass, you see the old St. John's Church, erected in 1818, where President Madison used to worship and where pretty Dolly Madison has often bowed her shapely head to the benediction of the sexton.

Further on is the residence of W. W. Corcoran, once occupied by Daniel Webster, and from which, on market mornings, a hired in a bottle-green carriage, with a black horse, would emerge on his way to do the marketing for the family.

When you turn out Connecticut avenue past Farragut square and statue you are on one of the handsomest streets in the world. Stretching away for a full mile to Dupont Circle is this magnificent avenue, bordered by elegant residences, the homes of people of wealth and consequence, including the Shepherd mansion, the princely British Legation mansion, and a hundred other modern palaces owned by officials and private citizens. Eighty years ago this ground was a swampy tract, and now it is worth from $5 to $15 a square foot for the ground only. There are thousands of people here who remember when this was a dreary waste of marshy ground, but for the indomitable energy of Alexander Shepherd and kindred spirits it would not be much better now.

As you go up Seventh street south of the Avenue you reach locations where the enterprising Hebrew haberdasher has cast his lot, and north of I street on Seventh are numerous establishments conducted by merchants of the same industrious class. You return on Seventh and transfer to the Avenue and thence to the Fourteenth street line. Fourteenth street is a beautiful one, and when you are on it, you are on a line that runs down Massachusetts and Vermont avenues and M and Fourteenth streets both ways you see one of the prettiest sights in Washington. This spot right in the heart of the city, where the Highland Terrace and the several handsome residences on the corners, including those of ex-Minister Schenck, General Joe Wheeler, Mrs. Admiral Dahlgren, and the fine stone church, with Luther's bronze statue, is a little gem of a picture of city elegance and opulence. In the quick ride to Fourteenth street and back to H you catch frequent glimpses of quiet little residences, with lawns, trees and garden, bordered by cosy homes, branching off in different directions. Everything has an air of well-bred independence from business and care.

THE NORTHEAST SECTION. When you reach New York avenue and return you take the Columbia Line, and the car carries you past New York avenue past Mount Vernon place, where you get a sight of K street, and Massachusetts avenue again. Then down the avenue and out H street for a straight stretch of probably two miles, and after you cross the railroad tracks you are in a new section of Washington. This has all been built in the last two or three years, and such wonderful improvement! Away out here you will sometimes see long lines of well-paved and shaded streets bordered only by grassy country and a few new houses around. The Parking Commission has done this, and next year the houses will begin to spring up with almost the rapidity of Aladdin's city.

THE SOUTHERN SECTION. Out in the northern portion of the city you see another class of residents, the great middle class. Most of these people are employees of the Government, and they live in the houses here. Here are long rows of neat two and three-story brick houses, sometimes thirty in a row. In front of each is a little grass plot, and the stone steps and entrance is white and clean, and the houses are all comfortably fixed, easy going and neighborly, and along about 8:30 in the morning, when they get ready to go to office, one would think an exodus of the neighborhood was about to take place. It is said that the prettiest girls in the city live along here, but young men in other sections scoff at the idea, and will make you hip and thigh if you assert it.

DOWN TO THE ARSENAL. The ride along the edge of the Smithsonian grounds is particularly interesting, especially about dusk. You pass in full view of the Monument and various public buildings down here, and the scene on the river and over the hills is beautiful. The last change is at Four-and-a-half street, where you take the car for the Arsenal. This is quite a resort now, the spacious grounds and walks offering special inducements for people to come down at sunset. You will arrive there just as the big red sun drops behind Fort Myer and the evening gun booms out across the waters and stirs the reed-beds in the nest of the flocks. On these fine moonlight nights, especially on such a night as Wednesday was, the groups of young people are numerous on the walk along the river's edge, where the big trees afford friendly shelter from the moon's inquisitive peering. There is really no describing the amount of pleasure, instruction and amusement to be derived from a ride over the various lines with twenty-five cents' worth of tickets.
